

Adjusting your commute to avoid being at work quite so much

 devblogs.microsoft.com/oldnewthing/20111004-00

October 4, 2011

Raymond Chen

Commenter Bernard remarked that he moved from one side of the company campus to the other, and his commute distance (and time) was cut in half. That reminds me of a short story from a now-retired colleague of mine. He bicycled to work, and over the years, the gradual expansion of the Microsoft main corporate campus resulted in nearly three quarters of his commute to work taking place on Microsoft property. This bothered him to the point where he changed his route just so he wouldn't be “at work” practically the moment he left his house.

Bonus chatter: Looks like Michael Kaplan also has one of these unbalanced commutes.

Raymond Chen

Follow

